

Adira

NSW Multicultural Centre for Women's and Family Safety

Collaborating to support effective, culturally responsive safety services for migrant and refugee women,
children and families.

About the Centre

Adira promotes culturally appropriate, evidence-based and community informed responses to domestic, family and sexual violence in NSW, including in regional and rural areas.

Our work is grounded in cultural responsiveness and informed by evidence and community insights.

The Centre collaborates with specialist services and other support services across women's safety, multicultural and settlement sectors in NSW to ensure that effective, safe and culturally responsive services are available to people who need them.

What we do

The Centre collaborates with services to strengthen culturally responsive domestic, family and sexual violence case management and support when working with women, children and families from multicultural communities.

- We provide cultural responsiveness and inclusive practice expertise and support, as well as advice on cultural, community and migration-related considerations.
- We accept referrals to ensure migrant and refugee women and children receive the specialist domestic, family and sexual violence support they need.
- We contribute to developing evidence on safety considerations impacting women, children and families from multicultural communities.

How we can support

- Consultation on complex cases and cultural considerations, and collaborative case management
- Referral pathways for specialist support
- Capacity building and collaborative initiatives to support culturally responsive practice
- Development of good practice models for enhanced service delivery
- Community engagement and awareness raising on the drivers of domestic, family and sexual violence and available support services
- Provision of population data and insights into emerging trends in communities.
